Sales of honey have dropped for the first time in six years, as British bee colonies continued to decline due to colony collapse disorder and bad weather. Figures from the British Beekeepers Association revealed that nearly a third of hives failed to survive the winter of 2007 while a fifth of the UK 's colonies were lost in 2008.

In the U.K. practical beekeeping was led in the early 20th century by a few men, pre-eminently Brother Adam and his Buckfast bee and R.O.B. Manley, author of many titles, including ' Honey Production In The British Isles ' and inventor of the Manley frame, still universally popular in the U.K. Other notable British pioneers include William Herrod-Hempsall and Gale.

Around 2,000 years ago, beekeepers began using the first artificial beehives, called skeps [source: Galway Beekeepers' Association]. Skeps look like overturned pots and were made from either baked clay or woven straw. A small hole near the bottom of the skep allowed the bees to come and go, and the comb was laid down inside.

Beekeeping in England changed rather little until the late nineteenth century when modern movable-frame hives were introduced. This paper deals with beekeeping from the twelfth to nineteenth centuries. In England and the rest of Europe, the honeybee kept in hives is Apis mellifera L. The bees collect nectar and pollen from flowers.
