I first contacted British archaeologist Ian Hodder roughly a quarter century ago when it was announced that Hodder was reopening Çatalhöyük, the Neolithic site in central Turkey, because I’d been writing about its discoverer, British archaeologist James Mellaart. Çatalhöyük is a 9,500-year-old “urban” settlement, rich in art, covering 32 acres of the Konya Plain.

Towards Reflexive Method in Archaeology: the ... —Ian Hodder

Çatalhöyük is located overlooking the Konya Plain, southeast of the present-day city of Konya (ancient Iconium) in Turkey, approximately 140 km (87 mi) from the twin-coned volcano of Mount Hasan. The eastern settlement forms a mound which would have risen about 20 m (66 ft) above the plain at the time of the latest Neolithic occupation.

Catalhoyuk itself illustrates so many of the themes of archeology it could comprise a course in its own right: social differentiation (or lack of), gender equality (or matriarchy?), the emergence of agriculture, the beginnings of urbanism (to Hodder Catalhoyuk is always a 'town', in quotes), symbolism and (by no means least) ritual.
