Industrial society has defined human progress on the basis of how much nature we can colonize, how many resources we can waste, how much wilderness we can erase or tame. We need to change our ideas of human progress and measure our humanity in terms of how many species flourish with us.

The End of the Wild | The MIT Press
The End of the Wild by Nicole Helget is a fictional, 4-6th grade middle school book on edible plants, fracking and family struggles. Eleven-year-old Fern, lives with her stepfather and her two brothers in a small, rundown house, on the edge of a poor town. Near their home is a grove of woods, where she and her family hunts and forages for food.

Many say the Wild West ended on this day in 1895 when John Wesley Hardin was gunned down in El Paso by the town's sheriff. Hardin was a legendary gun slinger who is purported to have gunned down over 40 men in his career. He was so mean that he allegedly shot and killed a man for snoring too loudly for his liking.

Everywhere at The End of Time is based in part on recent studies in dementia research that suggest that music is one of the last memories to degrade. "Music awakens a part of the brain not impacted by dementia and evokes responses, such as singing and movement, and brief moments of reconnection with loved ones," writes Dr Maggie Haertsch of the Australian Health Institute.
